Mr. Beecher's Sermon.

In his sermon last Sunday, Mr. Beecher said it is the duty of Christians to make goodness so attractive that men shall not require to be driven into the Church by appealing to their deluded fears, but shall long to enter it. seeing its brightness and beauty. All great moral qualities are beautiful to the natural man, though in a still greater degree to the regenerated man. Many preachers claim that the natural man cannot appreciate the beauty of moral qualities; but that is in direct opposition to the teachings of the Bible. When ('hrist says, "Let your light shine unto all men," He declares that there is among men a universal appreciation of these higher qualities When a man leaps into an icy torrent to save a drowning child, and, struggling for a time with the little one clasped to his breast. perceives that he must relinquish it or lose his own life and only holds it tighter, and goes over the falls, where their mangled bodies are found by the spectators, he is regarded as a hero. Was there ever, asked Mr. Beecher, a pi ce of sculp.ure or painting that thrilled the soul like this? All men are moved to admira tion by it, and yet it is a moral act. The admiration felt for a devoted wife who clings to a brutalized and drunken husband during life. and when he dies weeps alone over his grave. was adduced as an example of the sense of the beauty of self denial felt by all men. When all the beauty that is in moral quality shall be developed, the preacher said, the day of millennium shall have come

Those who had just joined the Church were then particularly addr ssed by Mr. Beecher. He warned them against retreating from the world as men fly from mean and-despised compapions. No man coming into the Church, he said, who produces the impression upon those from whom he separates that he has separated so that he has no longer any fellowship for them, no longer any heart-warming for them, acts contrary to the dectrine of for as when we were llim who gave Himself far from the knowledge of God and were even inimical to fivine government. No such method of teaching primary doctrines as shall make them seem harsh and unkind can possibly be Christian. When we are preaching any truth, obliging men to give up and conform to it, there may be a resistance, so far as personal will is concerned. But even when men do not themselves submit to it they see that it is beautitul. All men admire heroism, but all could not, or would not, be heroes. The great scheme of Christianity should be so preached that men should understand their high origin and noble destiny, and whoever makes God seem tyrannical, instead of adorning the doctrine makes it hateful. The preaching of men who arouse the fear, opposition, wrath and passion of men, and think that if they are then converted they will become better Christians, was compared to the action of a man who wanted to enter a house guarded by a ferocious bulldog, and who, instead of slipping in quietly without arousing the beast, should stand over against the house and throw stones for a while, and when this dog was wide-mouthed should go at him. If a man, said Mr. Beecher, thinks that is the way to preach the doctrines of Christ he has not understood the instructions of the Master. The preacher went on to deprecate the usual treatment of young converts, who are told to go out and start prayer meetings or distribute tracts. He did not say this was improper, but he claimed that to represent a Christian life as having its first conception and its peculiar testimony in setting everybody to deny something on or about everybody else, was a grave mistake. My advice, said he, to every one of you who has found the Lord Jesus Christ is to make yourself mere goldly. Begin in your own family. Let every duty that is incumbent upon you as a a husband, wife or child rise instantly to an exalted place and become more luminous; and do not look for a place to be better in, like a church or a conference meeting, but be better in yourself. After having made your own home beautiful, if there be opportunities to help others do not neglect them. Another thing to beware of was the practice of bemoaning one's wickedness to others. When men tell about their miserable lives or their "Christian experience," the effect of it is about as likely to inspire religious feeling as six or eight chunks of ice around a hearth would be to kindle a fire. The essential power of the Gospel of Christ, said the preacher, so far as you are concerned, will lie in how much of Christ you have in you and can exhibit to your fellow men. Christianity meant a larger, nobler manhood. Mr. Beecher warned his hearers against the low and vulgar notions of being Christians because they dare not be anything else. They should not, after entering the Church, lay aside all effort and feel that, being in the Church they were like passengers in a railway car, that all their duty was done, and it was now incumbent upon the Church to take them to their destination. In conclusion Mr. Beecher exhorted his hearers to lead true Christian. lives, glorify God, adorn the teaching of the
